To make sense of the social world, people reason about others' mental states, including whether and in what ways others can form new mental states. We propose that people's judgments concerning the dynamics of mental state change invoke a "naive theory of reasoning." On this theory, people conceptualize reasoning as a rational, semi-autonomous process that individuals can leverage, but not override, to form new rational mental states. Across six experiments, we show that this account of people's naive theory of reasoning predicts judgments about others' ability to form rational and irrational beliefs, desires, and intentions, as well as others' ability to act rationally and irrationally. This account predicts when, and explains why, people judge others as psychologically constrained by coercion and other forms of situational pressure.

Public Significance Statement

Judgments of others' psychological freedom and constraint are pivotal to a wide range of important social and political judgments. For instance, people believe that others are morally and legally responsible only when those individuals act freely. And, people evaluate political and economic institutions, and practices such as judges, price gouging, and sweatshop labor, partly based on how these institutions and practices affect people's freedom. We demonstrate that people's judgments of freedom and constraint draw principally on an intuitive theory of reasoning. This model shows how judgments about others' freedom may be a part of people's mature, allocentric, and rational theory of mind. Our model supplants prior theories according to which people make these judgments in a moralized or motivated way.

Keywords: theory of mind, control, rationality, reasoning, freedom

Consider someone who is living in dire poverty and just sold their kidney for a large sum of money. Were they free to walk away? How people answer this question reflects how they think about psychological freedom and constraint, and specifically, how they think about others' capacity to exert control over their own minds in the face of situational pressure. Attributions of this kind are pivotal for an important set of social judgments and behaviors. In the domain of law and moral judgment, for instance, people excuse others for their bad attitudes or harmful behaviors when they think that those individuals lack control over them (Alicke, 2000; Casimano & Goodwin, 2022; Weiner, 1995). Attributions of freedom and constraint are also important in political theory because people evaluate political institutions and economic systems based in large part on whether citizens are free under them (Nozick, 1974; Rawls, 1971; Wertheimer, 1987). Indeed, people's opinions on judges, price gouging, compensation in medical studies, sweatshop labor, and consent, to name a few, depend on their beliefs about whether individuals in these situations can think and act freely (Bacon, 1998; Fischel, 2019; Powell & Zwolinski, 2012; Sommers, 2019). For these reasons, understanding how people attribute mental state control to others is important for understanding why they hold others responsible and how they navigate complex social and political issues.
