

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) on Weltliteratur

[Compiled by Alok Yadav, George Mason University, 2009. Document available at: <http://mason.gmu.edu/~ayadav/>]

The single most canonical figure in German literature, Goethe has many claims on a reader's attention, but our focus will be on his pronouncements bearing on the idea of Weltliteratur ("world literature"). There is only a score or so of places where he uses the term "Weltliteratur" directly, but there are numerous other instances where he discusses issues that bear on the concept or that address it through some other phrasing. Goethe's main remarks on the subject are reproduced below in chronological order (undated remarks are grouped at the end).

1 ♦ (1801)

In his journal Propyläen, Goethe writes: "It is to be hoped that people will soon be convinced that there is no such thing as patriotic art or patriotic science. Both belong, like all good things, to the whole world, and can be fostered only by untrammelled intercourse among all contemporaries, continually bearing in mind what we have inherited from the past" (quoted in Fritz Strich, Goethe and World Literature. Trans. C. A. M. Sym. London: Routledge, 1949. 35).

2 ♦ (1825 Jan. 10)

Goethe's secretary and disciple, Johann Peter Eckermann, records him as remarking to a young Englishman: "It is part of the nature of the German to respect everything foreign for its own sake and to adapt himself to foreign idiosyncracies. This and the great suppleness of our language make German translations particularly accurate and satisfying" (from Johann Peter Eckermann, Conversations with Goethe. 1835; quoted in Strich 1949: 27).

3 ♦ (1827 Jan.)

After calling attention to two French reviews of a play (Alexander Duval's Le Tasse: Drame historique en cinq actes) that was adapted from his own play Torquato Tasso (1790), Goethe tells the readers of his journal Kunst und Altertum (Art and Antiquity) that he is not just drawing attention to the reception of his own work in these reviews: "I have something higher in mind, which I want to indicate provisionally. Everywhere one hears and reads about the progress of the human race, about the further prospects for world and human relationships. However that may be on the whole, which it is not my office to investigate and more closely determine, I nevertheless would personally like to make my friends aware that I am convinced a universal world literature is in the process of being constituted, in which an honorable role is reserved for us Germans. All nations are paying attention to us; they praise and criticize, accept and reject, imitate and distort, understand or misunderstand us and open or close their hearts to our concerns. We must accept this with equanimity because it is of great value to us" (from Goethe, Essays on Art
