

Liability Recognition and Nonowner Financing

Objective 1: Evaluate accounting for accrued liabilities.

Current Liabilities: Current section of the balance sheet reports liabilities to mature in a year.

Accrued liabilities: Adjustments made to the balance sheet. After all transactions have been recorded and prior to the issuance of the financial statements so that the financial statements fairly present the financial condition of the company.

1. These adjustments recognize liabilities that are not the result of external transactions.
2. Accrued liabilities are incurred in the current period and, therefore, must be recognized in the current period.
3. Two broad categories of accruals:
 - a. Routine contractual liabilities: Wages to employees for work performed but not yet paid, unpaid interest that is due in the current period, income taxes owed.
 - b. Contingent liabilities: Depend on the occurrence of a future uncertain event in order to determine whether a liability exists and in what amount.
 - i. Litigation is brought against the company.
 - ii. Warranty liabilities for products sold.

Accruals for Contingent Liabilities: Some liabilities are less certain because the ultimate settlement of the liability is contingent on the outcome of a future event.

1. Companies record a contingent liability when two conditions are met:
 - a. It is probable that one or more future events will confirm that a liability existed at the financial statement date.
 - b. The amount required to settle the liability in the future can be reasonably determined at the financial statement date.

Analysis of Warranty Footnote Disclosures: GAAP requires that warranty liabilities reflect the estimated cost the company expects to incur as a result of warranty claims.

1. Companies might intentionally underestimate warranty liability to report higher current income or overestimate warranty liability to depress current income and create a liability to absorb future warranty costs.
2. This would shift income from the current period to the future.
3. We must closely examine warranty liabilities and scrutinize deviations from the historical relation to sales levels or from peer company levels.

Objective 2: Analyze short-term debt.

Accounting for Short-Term Debt: When the company borrows short-term funds, it reports the cash received on the balance sheet together with an increase in liabilities.

1. The note is reported as current because the company expects to repay it in a year.
