

CHAPTER 1

THE EMERGENCE OF NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC INFORMATION STRATEGIES

INTRODUCTION

It is now more than 10 years since the Committee of Enquiry on Handling Geographic Information chaired by Lord Chorley described geographic information systems (GIS) as "the biggest step forward in the handling of geographic information since the invention of the map" (Department of Environment 1987, para 1.7). Since then the number of GIS applications throughout the world has increased exponentially and now extends from local banking and business services to large scale utilities management and from urban planning to global environmental modelling. As a result GIS has become a multi-million dollar industry whose development impacts on many different aspects of economic and social life.

The adoption and use of GIS technology has placed new demands on existing sources of geographic information. It has transformed conventional mapping and cartography out of all recognition. In place of the traditional paper map the new technology makes it possible to integrate digital geographic information from a variety of different sources to specifications designed by users rather than producers. In the process the same databases are often drawn on again and again in a wide range of different applications.

However, as the Chorley Committee pointed out, the availability of the technology itself is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for its effective utilisation. To facilitate the take up of GIS a number of institutional barriers must be overcome. Of particular importance in this respect is the need to take steps to promote the availability of digital data in forms that facilitate its use in a wide range of applications.

Issues such as these raise important questions regarding the future role that governments will play with respect to geographic information, as it must be recognised that, with the exception of one-off research activities, most operational applications of GIS are in some measure dependent upon the availability of data collected by government agencies. As Rhind (1995a, p.101) has pointed out:

"Government is almost everywhere the primary sponsor at present of the national geodetic framework and the source of 'framework' data provided by
