

Grammatical Literacy for Language Learners and Instructors

By Gonzalo Isidro Bruno

When someone learns or teaches a language in a classroom setting, thinking about grammatical concepts comes to mind almost immediately. For learners, these thoughts could result from deliberate mental processes or not (Imai & Saalback, 2010; Lucy, 2016). For instructors, these thoughts are opportunities to raise linguistic awareness. Having the ability to verbalize such conceptualizations or gaining the ability to verbalize them can help learners to grasp how languages work. Being grammatically informed, that is literate is a distinctive plus.

Many educators already talk about computer literacy, digital literacy, political literacy, health & financial literacy, mathematical or numerical literacy, media literacy, critical literacy, cultural literacy, information literacy, visual literacy, data literacy, foundational literacy, civic & ethic literacy, news literacy, information literacy, coding & computational literacy. With the same ease, we can talk about grammatical literacy (GL) without too much complication. In the previous list of literacies, literacy stands for the essential knowledge that assists individuals to accomplish a successful outcome or reach an objective. Thus, GL is an easier term to grasp and to convey its importance to willing and reluctant learners and to future or new language instructors.

GL can be described as a basic set of key grammatical concepts or conceptualizations available to language learners at the (meta) cognitive level. GL can be of paramount assistance with first, second, or multiple learning processes because it may allow learners to understand how language works, how language learning curricula may be organized, and how instructors explain form-oriented exercises. Having a linguistic awareness is the first step in developing GL, which in turn facilitates cognitive processes associated with language learning (Janecwicz, 2020; Lasagabaster, 2001; Leitz & Hoffman, 2000).

In the case of first language learners, there are observable early stages of linguistic-mental connections, such as, naming or describing objects, places, people, giving commands, making requests, narrating actions, or expressing emotions, wishes, or wants that involve using one's mother tongue mental constructs (Bohnenmeyer, 2010; Lucy, 2016). At these stages, children do not need to learn how to describe the way their language works to use it effectively. Eventually, monolingual individuals with different degrees of schooling might possess some explicit knowledge of grammatical categories, systems, and fundamentals that they can use in their primary education. An increased declarative and procedural grammatical knowledge can positively affect incipient writing and reading skills according to the English National Literacy Strategy Department for Education and Employment.

"All pupils have extensive grammatical knowledge. Much of this is implicit, but they are able to generalize and improvise from this knowledge. Teaching which focuses on grammar helps to make this knowledge explicit, extend children's range and develop more confident and versatile language use" (Department for Education and Employment, 2000, 7).

If you were to teach your language to someone else, you would probably take a
