

and application, we could hardly do justice to our subject without looking beyond these funding programs. Consider utilization: the ways that knowledge of social problems is used in making federal policy or operating federal programs reach far beyond the explicitly funded efforts to apply knowledge that are included in our definition of knowledge-application activities. Indeed, few of the steps by which Congress and federal agencies translate knowledge into social policy are separately budgeted and accounted for in this way. Furthermore, although the federal government is the world's leading investor in research on social problems, a variety of other public and private sources in this country and abroad help to create the knowledge the nation uses in facing its social problems. This wider view emphasizes the fact that the objective in applying knowledge should be to use effectively information from all sources and not just to be sure that the knowledge paid for by the federal government is somehow disseminated and used.

At times the users of knowledge also lie outside the federal government. Indeed, the majority of research funded by the federal government is intended for use not by Congress or federal agencies but by state and local governments, school systems, hospitals, police forces, industry, and the public at large. We refer to these potential users as "third parties"—federal sponsors and research performers being the "first" and "second" parties. Issues surrounding the effective use of "third-party" research are a main concern of this report.

The following chart summarizes the categorization of those who fund the production of knowledge of social problems and those who use that knowledge:

Knowledge Is Produced	Knowledge Is Used
	Within the Federal Government	Outside the Federal Government
With Federal Funding	a	b
With Other Funding	c	d
