

• 4. Evaluation of feedstuff (digestibility trials)

- Chemical analysis indicates the potential value of a feed for supplying a particular nutrient, but the actual value of a feed to the animal can be arrived only after making allowance for the inevitable losses that occur during digestion, absorption and metabolism. The first tax imposed on the feed is that represented by the part of it which is not absorbed and is therefore excreted in the feces.
- Digestibility refers to the disappearance of feed or food from the gastrointestinal tract. In other words, digestibility is the degree of degradation of feedstuffs in the gut. Digestibility coefficient is therefore, the proportion of which is not excreted in the feces and which is therefore, assumed to be absorbed by the animal thus available for metabolism. Therefore, digestibility is an essential feature of feedstuff evaluation. As it has been said digestibility measures the amount of nutrients in a feed that is digested and absorbed and thus available for metabolism. For instance, if row fish meal contains 90% CP but the digestibility of the protein is only 10%, this means the potential usable CP content is only 9%.

Factors that may affect digestibility

- Digestibility results of the same feed may be variable because of different factors. These include:

1. Level of feed intake

- An increase in the quantity of feed eaten by an animal generally causes a faster rate of passage of digesta, meaning the feed will be exposed to the action of digestive enzymes for a shorter period, and there may be a reduction in its digestibility. This has higher effect for the slowly digestible components of feeds namely cell wall constituents.
- Levels of feed intake are often expressed as multiples of maintenance requirement (maintenance requirement defined as unity). Where an animal is given above maintenance requirement the animal is not efficient in its digestibility because the animal has plenty and digestive system digests enough. Therefore, we have to keep an animal not over fed when we use them for digestibility trial.

2. frequency of feeding

- This is related to the level of feed intake. If an animal is fed 3 meal systems and an animal fed continuously, the digestion will be lower in the latter group. Because when an animal is fed 2-3 times a day, this will give more time to be attacked by enzymes of the microbes and host resulting to more efficient digestion than the animal fed continuously.
