Bothwell,1994-12-01 Determines 1 what the extent and nature of derivative use was 2 what risks derivatives might pose to individual firms and the financial system and how firms and regulators were attempting to control these risks 3 whether gaps and inconsistencies existed in U S regulation of derivatives 4 whether existing accounting rules resulted in financial reports that provided market participants and investors adequate information about firms use of derivatives and 5 what the implications of the international use of derivatives were for U S regulations 20 charts and tables Financial derivatives Estados Unidos. General Accounting Office,1994 Financial Derivatives ,1994 Over-the-counter Derivatives and Systemic Risk to the Global Financial System Michael R. Darby,1994 Over the last decade dealing in derivative financial instruments basically forwards futures options and combinations of these particularly in the over the counter OTC derivatives market has become a central activity for major wholesale banks and financial institutions Measured in terms of notional principal amount OTC derivatives outstanding are near if not greater than US 10 trillion even after deduction of double counting for intra dealer transactions Major new regulatory initiatives including proposed new capital requirements are under consideration as a means of reducing systemic risk This paper examines the concept of systemic risk that failure of one firm will lead to the failure of a large number of other firms or indeed the collapse of the international financial system Alternative proposed definitions are considered and integrated and the effects of OTC derivatives on these risks discussed The key conclusion is that systemic risk has been reduced by the development of the OTC derivatives market due to shifting economic risks to those better able either to bear the risk or in many cases cancel it against offsetting risks The implications of the Basle II capital proposals for systemic risk are analyzed and shown to increase this risk due to encouraging transactions which increase portfolio risks of the dealers and discouraging transactions which decrease their portfolio risk
