

Analysis and Interpretation of Financial Statements

Chapter 3

Analysis & Interpretation of Financial Statements

- It is basically analyzing the various records of financial statements for financial decision making.
- Financial statement analysis involves comparing a firm's performance with that of other firms in the same industry and evaluating trends in the firm's financial information over time.
- Managers use financial analysis to identify situations needing attention, potential lenders use financial analysis to determine whether a company is creditworthy, and stockholders use financial analysis to help predict future earnings, dividends, and free cash flow.

Ratio Analysis

- Ratio Analysis is one of the most used method of financial statement analysis.
- Ratio Analysis shows the relationship among two or more variables of financial statements.
- A single accounting figure may not communicate a meaningful and comparative information, but ratios can be used for decision making and comparison.
- Financial ratios are designed to extract important information that might not be obvious simply from examining a firm's financial statements.
- Ratios are relative measures and are comparable among companies and with the past trends.

In mathematics, a ratio is a comparison of two or more numbers that indicates their sizes in relation to each other.
