Evolution and clinical application of microsurgery

Microsurgery is a general term for surgery requiring an operating microscope. Microscope is a word coming from two ancient Greek words, μικρός meaning "small", and σκοπέω meaning "to see". It is an instrument used to see objects that are too small for the naked eye. The first microscope was claimed to be invented in 1590 by Zacharias Janssen, a spectacle-maker, who tried to find a way to make magnification even greater to help people with seriously poor eyesight.

The first operating microscope, a monocular microscope, was built in 1921 in the University of Stockholm by Carl-Olof Siggesson Nylen, a Swedish otolaryngologist. He was the first to use the microscope to perform surgeries initially on animals. In November 1921, he used the microscope to operate on the first patient, with a labyrinthine fistula. The binocular microscope that we use now was developed in 1922, by Carl's colleague Gunnar Holmgren.

The most obvious developments in microsurgery have been procedures allowing anastomosis of successively smaller blood vessels and nerves which have allowed transfer of tissue from one part of the body to another and reattachment of severed parts. Before the term "microsurgery" appeared, vascular anastomosis was performed since 1896, well beyond the birth of operating microscope.

John Benjamin Murphy, an American physician, successfully anastomosed a femoral artery severed by gunshot wound in 1897. In 1902, Alexis Carrel, a French surgeon, originated the method of triangulation for arterial and venous anastomosis. In 1908, he devised methods for transplantation of whole organs. In 1912, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine, for pioneering vascular anastomosis techniques and in recognition of his work on organ transplantation.

The Second World War catalysed the advancement of vascular surgery. Establishment of antibiotics, improvement in infection control, and development of fine sutures and instruments improved the results of vascular surgery and resulted in successful anastomosis of small vessels >3mm. The first surgery using microscope to aid in vascular anastomosis was done by Jules Jacobson, a vascular surgeon of the University of Vermont, who described the anastomosis of vessels as small as 1.4mm in 1960, and first used the term "microsurgery".

The first replantation was done in 1962, by a team of chief residents led by Ronald Malt at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. It was a replantation at the level of the proximal humerus in a 12 year old child. But a microscope was not used at that time. The first reported replantation was done in 1963 by Chen Zhongwei in Shanghai 6th People's Hospital in China. It was a distal forearm replantation in a mechanist. The first revascularization of a finger, a partially amputated thumb, was done in 1963, by Harold Kleinert of the University of Louisville Hand Clinic.

The first replantation of finger, a completely amputated thumb, was done in 1965, by Shigeo Komatsu and Susumu Tamai of the Medical University of Nara Prefecture. In 1966, Yang Dongyue and Gu Yudong in Huashan Hospital, Fudan University, China, did the first toe-hand transfer (2nd toe to thumb transfer). He then reported the first free groin flap in 1973. The first clinically successful free bone graft (fibula) with microvascular anastomosis was reported by Taylor in 1975. Chen Zhongwei reported on a patient with Volkmann's contracture who underwent a free pectoralis major transfer for reconstruction of flexor muscles in 1975.

With the huge number of injury cases, especially in the countries with rapid industrial growth, microsurgery became increasingly important. In the field of hand surgery, the scope of microsurgery extended from just vascular repair, to restoration of severed parts (replantation), to tissue transfer to compensate defects and to improve functions.
