

The formation of Mid-Ocean Ridges often begins with a rift valley:

Continental rifting occurs where plate motions produce opposing tensional forces that thin the lithosphere and promote upwelling in the mantle.

Stretching causes the brittle crust to break into large blocks that sink, generating a rift valley.

Continued spreading generates a long narrow sea similar to the present-day Red Sea.

Eventually, an expansive deep-ocean basin containing a centrally located oceanic ridge is formed by continued seafloor spreading.
