ABSTRACT

RAND Corporation, a famous American think-tank strategy research institution, started the research on how to better apply game theory on the analysis of foreign policy as early as in the 1970s, which shows that the United States attaches great importance to the research on the application of game theory to the field of international relations and diplomacy [1].

Keywords: Game theory, International relations.

1. INTRODUCTION

Obviously, when it comes to the current state of domestic research in China, this kind of theoretical topic is extremely helpful for the study of international relations and foreign policy-making. Our study is left far behind by those developed countries, so it is meaningful to explore the influence of game theory, especially in the study of international relations in China.

2. THE GAME THEORY OF THE ROLE OF THE CONTROVERSY

2.1. The Controversy Surrounding the Game Theory

In the 1950s, after international relations theory was undergoing the behaviorist revolution, the whole process not only introduced game theory into the study and application of international relations theory, but also caused a fierce debate on the applicability of the game theory in the field of international relations [2].

The behaviorist school of thought has started the debate, describes itself as a "scientific" theory, rejecting realistic and idealistic historical and philosophical normative research methods. What they do is advocating empirical or experimental research methods - holistic research, including category analysis and pattern analysis. Strategic research includes game analysis and decision analysis, and econometric research, statistical analysis, mathematical analysis, and computer analysis. They advocate the exclusion of value criteria from the research process, arguing that non-value or value-neutral research is possible; and advocate the refinement and quantification of theory and a more confirmation orientation. They sharply criticize realism in two main aspects: (1) Realism overemphasizes the role of power, and wrongly treats it as the core of the field of international relations, but ignores many other important factors such as ethics, morality, and law. (2) Realism lacks precision in defining concepts such as power, national interest, and parity. Based on the criticism of realism, they actively applied new scientific methods to study international relations, proposed empirical theories, and behavioral models, and sought to make the study of international relations clearer, more precise, and more scientific. On the one hand, the traditional school of thought believes that traditional research methods are still useful and essential, that philosophy, history, and the law should still be the basis of international relations research. And realist research methods are meticulous, precise, and logical. On the other hand, they criticize scientific behaviorism for overemphasizing empirical evidence at the expense of ignoring philosophical, historical, and ethical factors. They argue that the thrust of political science is different from the thrust of physics: scientific knowledge can be used to study historical facts, while understanding, wisdom, and instinct are only applied to the study of human relations; they advocate the scientific method often mistakenly treat the method as reality; the scientific method requires a high degree of measurability and precision, making it difficult to deal with the most volatile situations amid international politics [3].
