Objectives: Students learn about the earth's surface, its climate, and its resources (agriculture, forests, etc. for products, transportation, communication) through the water resources issues of a water-supplyed New Hampshire for environmental justice (water quality and quantity).

Physical geography is the study of the earth's surface, its climate, and its resources. The importance of a course and the knowledge gained in it are such, particularly in a department devoted to environmental and climate change, that everything related to the earth and climate is approached systematically. It offers the student an opportunity to explore the physical world and its effects on the human world in any degree of detail that is brought to the attention of a student. The course is designed to provide a solid foundation for the student's future studies.
